CONTENTS

Happy Memories of Bernard Weiss .......................................................... vii
  Peter Sluglett

Bibliography of the Writings of Bernard Weiss ..................................... xv
  Elizabeth Clark (comp.)

The Spirit of Islamic Law: Introduction .............................................. 1
  Robert Gleave and A. Kevin Reinhart

PART ONE
LAW AND REASON

The Wisdom of God’s Law: Two Theories .............................................. 19
  Ahmed El Shamsy

La notion de wajh al-ḥikmah dans les uṣūl al-fiqh d’Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī (m. 476/1083) ................................................................. 39
  Éric Chaumont

Ritual Action and Practical Action: The Incomprehensibility of Muslim Devotional Action ................................................................. 55
  A. Kevin Reinhart

“I斯塔фи qalbaka wa in aftāka al-nasu wa aftūka”: The Ethical Obligations of the Muqallid between Autonomy and Trust ........ 105
  Mohammad Fadel

PART TWO
LAW AND RELIGION

Saḥnūn’s Mudawwanah and the Piety of the “Shari‘ah-minded” .... 129
  Jonathan E. Brockopp
CONTENTS

Sins, Expiation and Non-rationality in Ḥanafi and Shāfīʿī fiqh .......... 143

Christian Lange

Jurists’ Responses to Popular Devotional Practices in Medieval Islam ........................................................................................................ 177

Raquel M. Ukeles

PART THREE

LAW AND LANGUAGE

Finding God and Humanity in Language: Islamic Legal Assessments as the Meeting Point of the Divine and Human .................. 199

Paul R. Powers

Literal Meaning and Interpretation in Early Imāmī Law ............... 231

Robert Gleave

“Genres” in the Kitāb al-Luqṭah of Ibn Rushd’s Bidāyat al-mujtahid wa-nihāyat al-muqtaṣid ............................................................................ 257

Wolfhart Heinrichs

PART FOUR

LAW: DIVERSITY AND AUTHORITY

Is There Something Postmodern about Uṣūl Al-Fiqh? Ijmāʿ, Constraint, and Interpretive Communities ............................................. 285

Joseph Lowry

Body and Spirit of Islamic Law: Madhhab Diversity in Ottoman Documents from the Dakhla Oasis, Egypt ........................................ 317

Rudolph Peters

Tracing Nuance in Māwardī’s al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniyyah: Implicit Framing of Constitutional Authority ................................................... 331

Frank E. Vogel

Index ................................................................................................................... 361
The Ethical Obligations of the Muqallid Between Autonomy and Trust

Mohammad Fadel

In the theological tradition of kalām, epistemology and dogma are fused. The fusion between epistemology and dogma is evidenced by the claim of Muslim theologians that theoretical dogma must be based on knowledge (ʿilm), which by definition is accessible to all rational persons.1 This emphasis on epistemology is also evidenced in the many works of Sunnī jurisprudence (usūl al-fiqh), whether Ashʿarī or Muʿtazili, which adopt the distinction between knowledge and considered opinion (ẓann). In contrast to kalām, for example, which demands certainty for its conclusions,2 usūl al-fiqh was generally satisfied if the conclusions its methods supported were merely probable (rājiḥ).3

One can also distinguish kalām from usūl al-fiqh in another important respect: all individuals, in their individual capacities, are required to have knowledge of the truth of kalām’s theological propositions,4 while in the domain of jurisprudence individuals are generally not obliged to reach a substantive conclusion regarding the judgments produced in jurisprudence.

---

3 Zysow, supra n. 1 at 4.

Instead, most individual Muslims were non-specialists (muqallid) who were obliged to identify an appropriate scholar-specialist—one who has mastered the tools of jurisprudence (mujtahid or mufti)—and to follow the jurisprudential opinions of that scholar-specialist without affirming or rejecting that scholar-specialist’s reasoning (ijtihād) in support of that opinion (taqlid). As Professor Weiss has suggested, this task is itself a type of ijtihād, but unlike the mujtahid-mufti who sought a probative opinion regarding a rule of conduct, the mujtahid-muqallid “was trying to arrive at a sound opinion as to who might be truly qualified to interpret the law for him.”5 This task, however, was complicated by the range of views expressed by mujtahid-muftis, thus giving rise to the problem of how a muqallid could determine his ethical obligations in the face of divergent, even contradictory opinions of muftis.6

In this chapter, I will survey the views and arguments of various pre-modern scholars of uṣūl al-fiqh on the ethical dilemma facing muqallids as a result of the ethical pluralism generated by uṣūl al-fiqh’s individualist ethical paradigm. I will begin with a general discussion of the epistemological context (or the domain) in which taqlid is operative and its relationship to moral obligation. I will then take up the different views expressed on the question of how the ethical obligation of an individual is to be determined in a context of moral controversy. I will then argue that the pre-modern solutions to this problem, because of their focus on epistemology, are highly unsatisfactory. I instead suggest that a better way to understand taqlid is as a relationship of trust in which an otherwise autonomous individual gives up aspects of his own autonomy for rational self-regarding reasons, but only because that other is morally worthy of receiving that trust. On the account of taqlid I propose, the muqallid plays a central role in maintaining the integrity of Islamic law by monitoring would-be mujtahids to ensure that they conform to Islamic ethical ideals.

I. Individual Obligations and the Domain of Taqlīd

Islamic theology and ethics adopted an epistemological approach rooted in theoretical reason’s ability to discover the truth of God’s commands (the basis of moral obligations according to the Ashʿaris), or the ethical

---

6 Id. at 129.
content of good and evil (the basis of moral obligations according to the Muʿtazilīs) in contrast, for example, to a Kantian approach to ethics which is grounded in the practical reason of autonomous persons. Indeed, al-Ghāzalī goes so far as to say that a mujtahid can commit sin only in those areas where it is possible to attain epistemological certainty. The theological propositions to which one must subscribe are claimed to be rational and therefore individuals may know them to be true, in the same manner they can know other rational propositions, e.g. that an object cannot be in two places at once, or that parallel lines never meet, are also true. Accordingly, despite the fact that theologians oblige non-mujtahids to follow the legal opinions of mujtahids in matters of substantive law (fiṣrūʿ), they prohibit taqlīd with respect to theological dogma, uṣūl al-dīn. This seems to suggest that all Muslims must be mutakallimūn, and indeed, the theologian al-Faḍālī states that theology must be the first object of study, for without an understanding of this subject, one could not even make a judgment as to whether one’s prayers were valid.

But is it really the case that all Muslims must become mutakallimūn in order for their faith to be valid? It turns out that for many, if not most theologians, the answer is clearly not: it is sufficient if a person has a general proof (ijmālī) as to the truth of Islamic dogma, rather than the detailed (tafṣīlī) proofs of kalām. This distinction was popular for at least two reasons: first, it answered the palpable skepticism that was expressed by opponents of kalām when theologians claimed that rational understanding of the Islamic creed was a condition for the validity of faith; and second, it also provided a counter to dissidents within the theological tradition, e.g. the Baghdadi Muʿtazilites, who rejected taqlīd in its entirety, whether in theology or in law.

For opponents of kalām, the claim that rational proof was required for faith to be valid was not only contrary to the experience of the Muslim community, it was also absurd on its face, insofar as it inevitably led to

---

8 Al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 347–348.
9 For a summary of various theologians’ views on the necessity of individuals’ holding a rational belief in God, see Fadel, supra n. 2 at 31–33 (2008).
10 Al-Faḍālī, supra n. 4 at 327.
the conclusion that the vast majority of professing Muslims—given the undeniable fact that most Muslims did not understand theological argument and probably never could—were in fact unbelievers.12 The notion of a general proof responded to both of these objections: while it was no doubt true that the early community did not develop sophisticated theological proofs of God’s unity, for example, there was ample evidence that they had general proofs for the existence of God, and that even the rude Bedouin were capable of apprehending such proofs.13

The notion of a general proof also answered the Baghdadi Mu’tazilites who criticized the doctrine of taqlîd in substantive law as being inconsistent with the notion that knowledge was required in theological matters: a prohibition of taqlîd in matters of substantive law is tantamount to one of two things, either muqallids are not subject to moral obligation, or muqallids are obliged to undertake ijtihād when faced with a situation not covered by an express rule. While all agree that muqallids are subject to moral obligation even when there is no express text of revelation, nonetheless forcing muqallids to become mujtahids would be absurd because it would lead to the end of civilization—all productive activities would grind to a halt because people would become preoccupied with learning the tools of ijtihād rather than, for example, cultivating the soil. Theological matters, however, are relatively easy to grasp, because they are rational propositions, especially if all that is needed is a general proof. Accordingly, for the Basran Mu’tazilites and the Ash’arites generally, it appears that taqlîd in matters of substantive law is akin to a special dispensation—a kind of rukhṣah—that is necessitated by the deleterious consequences to collective human life should everyone attempt to be a mujtahid in matters of substantive law.

The distinction between a general proof—which is assumed to be within the reasonable grasp of all rational individuals—and the detailed proofs of theology does not solve the problem, however, so much as dissolve it. Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī criticized this distinction as meaningless because it misconstrues the nature of a proof: a proof must include only those propositions that are necessary to demonstrate the truth of the 12 Indeed, during the Saljuk era, this led to the scandalous issue known as takfīr al-ʿawāmm, which was used to discredit Ash’arī theologians before the Saljuk sultans. See Wilferd Madelung, The Spread of Maturidism and the Turks, Actas IV congresso de estudios árabes e islâmicos 109, 129 n. 52 (describing persecution of Ash’arites by Tughrulbeg as a consequence, in part, of the Ash’arī doctrine of takfīr al-ʿawāmm) (1968).

---

13 Fadel, supra n. 2 at 33.(quoting al-Jurjānī’s Sharḥ al-Mawāqif for the proposition that the early Muslim community, including the Bedouin, had general proofs of divine unity).
proposition being asserted. If, in the course of the proof, a proposition is added, or is deleted, or is accepted without proof, the proof is not a simplified version of the “real” proof: it is simply no longer a proof and can only be accepted on the basis of taqlīd.\textsuperscript{14} And in fact, this is the case of general proofs in al-Rāzī’s opinion: they are insufficient to save the generality of Muslims from the charge that their religious faith is simply the result of opinion and not based on knowledge.\textsuperscript{15}

Al-Rāzī also pointed out that the conventional anti-\textit{i}jjī\textit{ḥād} argument used by both the Basran Mu‘tazilites and the Ash‘arites to refute the Baghdadi Mu‘tazilites—that it is a social impossibility for everyone to be a mujtahid—is only true if one accepts other controversial epistemological premises, specifically, the obligation to act in accordance with the requirements of solitary reports (\textit{khabar al-wāḥid}) and analogy (\textit{qiyās}). Otherwise, if one rejects the authority of solitary traditions and analogy, ethical reasoning would not require years of specialized training because in areas of life where revelation is either silent or ambiguous, individuals would be left to the judgment of reason, which is accessible to all without great effort, and in cases where an individual is unable to discern what reason requires, it would be a relatively simple matter for the mujtahid to point out to the muqallīd what the rational principles governing the issue are.\textsuperscript{16}

Given Islamic theology’s epistemological preference for knowledge, and its general condemnation of taqlīd, it is unsurprising that the obligation to perform taqlīd was somewhat of an embarrassment. All things being equal, a mujtahid could not, for example, rely on the conclusions of another mujtahid, but instead had to engage in his own \textit{i}jjī\textit{ḥād} when faced with an issue that he had heretofore not considered. Indeed, it was a controversial matter as to whether a mujtahid, having once pondered a question of law, was then required to reconsider his earlier reasoning if the issue came up later or whether he could simply rely on his previous \textsuperscript{15} In an apparent criticism of al-Ghazālī, al-Rāzī rejected the argument put forth by al-Ghazālī that knowledge of the truth of the Prophet—by virtue of his miracles—is sufficient to absolve a Muslim of the charge of taqlīd. According to al-Rāzī, knowledge of the Prophet’s miracles does not necessitate by itself that Muhammad was a prophet who was truthful in his claims unless a host of other propositions are also demonstrated to be true. \textit{Id.} at 530–531.

\textsuperscript{16} \textit{Id.} at 528–529.
reasoning.\textsuperscript{17} There was no general agreement on this point, however. Al-Qarâfî, for example, argued that the passage of time is relevant to the reasoning of a \textit{mujtahid}—presumably because of new learning and new experience—and accordingly, in most cases, it would be erroneous to assume that the \textit{mujtahid} would give the same opinion at the end of his life that he gave in its beginning, as evidenced by the multiple opinions attributed to the historical \textit{mujtahids}. Accordingly, a \textit{mujtahid} is obliged to reconsider issues even when he recalls his original analysis of the question.\textsuperscript{18}

The disrepute of \textit{taqlîd} also led to a line of argument that denied that the obligation of a \textit{muqallid} to defer to the judgment of a \textit{mujtahid} counted as \textit{taqlîd} at all. According to this argument, \textit{taqlîd} is accepting the opinion of another without proof, but the kind of \textit{taqlîd} that Sunnî theologians countenanced did not suffer from this defect: the legitimacy of the Sunnî institution of \textit{taqlîd} was grounded in objective proof (or so it was claimed). This argument goes back at least as far as al-Ghazâlî who stated that, unlike the \textit{taqlîd} of the \textit{ḥashwiyyah} and the \textit{Taʿlîmiyyah}, his call for \textit{muqallids} to adhere to the opinions of \textit{mujtahids} is grounded in certain proof. Because it is not self-evident that the authority whom a person takes as a source of moral instruction is truthful, a rational personal demands proof from such an authority that he is truthful before he would agree to defer to his teachings. In the case of the Prophet Muḥammad, that proof lies in the various miracles he wrought. Because we know that the Prophet Muḥammad is truthful, al-Ghazâlî argued, we know that what he reports about God is also truthful. We also know that the consensus of the Muslim community is truthful because the Prophet informed us that the consensus of the Muslim community is immune from error. Accordingly, following the command of the consensus of the Muslim community does not constitute \textit{taqlîd} because it is justified by our knowledge that consensus is an infallible source of moral truth.

\textsuperscript{17} See, for example, al-Qarâfî, \textit{supra} n. 1 at pp. 4098–4099 (quoting Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzî as permitting a \textit{mujtahid} to rely on his previous analysis of a legal issue only to the extent that he recalls his previous reasoning, but if he has forgotten his previous reasoning, he is obliged to reconsider the issue). See also, Bernard Weiss, \textit{The Search for God’s Law} (University of Utah Press: Salt Lake City, 1992) 723 (noting that al-Āmidî described this issue as controversial among \textit{usûlîs}).

\textsuperscript{18} Al-Qarâfî, \textit{supra} n. 1 at p. 4101 (arguing in favor of an absolute obligation to engage in \textit{iḥtîād} each time the issue comes up, even when the \textit{mujtahid} recalls his previous reasoning).
The institution of taqlid, according to al-Ghazālī, can be analogized to judicial procedure which requires a judge to accept the testimony of upright witnesses, despite the possibility that they may be lying. In this case, the judge cannot be accused of having engaged in taqlid because he is giving effect to a rule derived from consensus, and is thus acting on proof. The same principle applies to the muqallid: when he follows the opinion of the mujtahid, he is acting in accordance with the command of an infallible source, in this case, consensus. This infallible source obliges him to follow the opinion of the mujtahid, whether or not the mujtahid is truthful, just as consensus obliges the judge to rule in accordance with the testimony of upright witnesses despite the possibility that they may be lying. Taqlid, on al-Ghazālī’s account, is a therefore a procedure for satisfying the ethical obligations of a muqallid; the legitimacy of this procedure is established with certainty, even if its results may be erroneous in particular circumstances. The Sunnī practice of taqlid cannot, therefore, be compared to the Ta‘līmiyyah’s version of taqlid because the latter cannot provide a rational justification for why individuals should submit to the teachings of their Imam.19

Taqlid, therefore, for the Ash’arites and Basran Mu’tazilites, was limited to rules of conduct (fiqhiyyāt) (provided of course that the issue was not covered by an express text, e.g. the prohibition of khamr (grape wine), or fornication). It did not apply to dogma or even the rational matters of uṣūl al-fiqh (al-ʿaqliyyāt), such as whether a solitary tradition or analogy constitutes proofs of a divine rule, or whether every mujtahid is correct or only one. Taqlid in matters of conduct was tolerable in part not only because of the epistemological uncertainty that characterized ijtihād, but also because, from a theological perspective, not much was at stake: while theological error involved blasphemy insofar as it entailed affirming statements about God that were false, controversies regarding matters of conduct all revolved around affirming or denying the positive commands or prohibitions of God, any of which, from a rational perspective, God might conceivably have decreed.20 Because errors in rules of conduct do not carry the risk of blasphemy, there is no harm in deferring to the views of others.

19 Al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 371.
20 Al-Qarāfī, supra n. 118 at 4136.
II. Taqlīd and Moral Controversy: The Muqallid’s View

According to the uṣulīs, the muqallid is as much a moral agent (mukallaf) as the mujtahid. Both are subject to the same obligation of having true knowledge of God. Both are required to affirm the truth of the prophets when confronted by evidence that they are truthful in their claims. Both are required to conform their conduct according to prophetic teachings to the extent such teachings are indisputable (the so-called ma ʿulima min al-dīn bi-l-ḍarūra). Their obligations only differ when it comes to determining the scope of moral obligation for acts that are not subject to an express rule of revelation. When faced with such a circumstance, the mujtahid reasons to a rule using the texts of revelation as a basis for forming his rule. The muqallid, however, is subject to another duty: to find a mujtahid and ask him what to do.

It is important to keep in mind that the obligation to perform taqlīd is contingent upon the inability of the muqallid to investigate the texts of revelation himself to arrive at an answer. More importantly, the muqallid, given his theological knowledge, knows that he is not in a position to resolve any ethical dilemmas that might arise as a result of events not subject to an express revelatory rule. He also knows that he could escape the obligation of taqlīd were he to devote himself to becoming a mujtahid. On the other hand, while he has no ethical obligation to become a mujtahid, he does have the choice to devote himself to learning and become a mujtahid or continue living a life unconnected with learning and scholarship. For a person uninterested in religious scholarship, then, taqlīd offers a practical solution to the general problem that ethical knowledge—other than the basic ethical obligations that are a necessary part of revelation—is specialized knowledge. Taqlīd seems to offer the muqallid the opportunity to have his cake and eat it too: the chance to live an ethical life without having to master the various obscure sciences required of a mujtahid.

But, if something is too good to be true, we may have reason to be skeptical. Taqlīd is no exception. Less dramatically, taqlīd is really only 21 This follows simply from the fact that such are rules are established with certainty so there is no room for disagreement with respect to such an obligation.

---

22 See, e.g., al-Āmidī, supra n. 11 at 275–276 (a mujtahid always engages in independent ijtihād when faced with a novel question) and at 299 (a muqallid is obliged to follow the opinion of a mujtahid with respect to matters of ijtihād); see also, al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 368–369 (same with respect to the mujtahid) and at 362–363 (same with respect to the muqallid).
helpful to a muqallid when he is lucky enough to know the views of only one mujtahid. In this case, his ethical life is greatly simplified: whenever he has a question, he simply asks the mujtahid and acts in conformity with what the mujtahid tells him. But how does a muqallid know that someone is a mujtahid, i.e. possesses that combination of learning and moral integrity that permits him to serve as a source of ethical knowledge for the muqallid? For most üşūlī, a muqallid can ascertain whether someone is a mujtahid by consideration of certain objective social facts. For example, if the person in question gives fatwas publicly, the public accepts him as an authority (as evidenced by the fact that they seek out his fatwas), the public generally accepts that person’s fatwas, and no one challenges his credentials, then a muqallid in that case has a sufficient basis to believe that such person is in fact a mujtahid.24

If he comes to know about more than one mujtahid, his ethical life becomes more complicated, but only slightly: so long as he is ignorant of any disagreements between or among the mujtahids that he knows, he is free to question any of the mujtahids he knows for advice.25 When the muqallid comes to know that mujtahids disagree, however, matters become complex. The solution to this problem, moreover, does not turn on one’s stand with respect to the fallibility of mujtahids: in the absence of an institutional mechanism whereby one of the many proposed solutions to an ethical problem could be declared to be correct and the others mistaken, the fact that one mujtahid is correct and the others are mistaken is irrellevant from the perspective of a muqallid. Because Islamic ethical theory does not provide an objective perspective from which anyone (whether a mujtahid or muqallid) could conclude which of the competing opinions is the one that ought to be implemented, all opinions of mujtahids from the perspective of the muqallid seem to have a prima facie claim to validity.
In short, when faced with ethical controversy, it is not at all clear what the muqallid should do, or even whether it makes sense to speak of the muqallid in this context as having an ethical obligation at all.26

---

25 See, e.g., al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 373; 4 al-Shāṭibī, supra n. 24 at 132–133.

26 See infra n. 41.
Disagreement among mujtahids creates numerous potential ethical problems for the uṣūlī tradition. To be clear, this uncertainty also had the potential to undermine the efficacy and integrity of the entire legal system derived from Islamic jurisprudence. As I have argued elsewhere, the institutionalization of taqlīd in courts and public-fatwa giving served to mitigate substantially the political problems arising out of indeterminacy. Here, however, I wish to focus on another problem: the ethical obligations of the muqallid when faced with conflicting opinions of mujtahids, and whether the uṣūlis proposed a workable solution for a muqallid who is assumed to be acting with moral integrity (ʿadl).

Looming large in the discussions of the uṣūlis was whether an irresolvable dispute among mujtahids meant that the muqallid was free to choose among any of the positions advanced by a qualified mujtahid, a position known as takhyīr. It would be tempting to suppose that those who advocated takhyīr also endorsed the doctrine of the infallibility of mujtahids with regards to their moral reasoning. While this was the case for the infallibilist Abū Bakr al-Bāqillānī, not all uṣūlis’ views on takhyīr were derivative of their position on infallibilism. Some uṣūlis who endorsed infallibilism, al-Ghazālī, for example, nevertheless rejected takhyīr in favor of imposing an obligation on the muqallid to engage in a process of tarjīḥ, weighing the competing opinions, although as we shall see below, no jurist who advocated tarjīḥ suggested that muqallids could weigh the substantive merits of the different views expressed. Likewise, some uṣūlis who rejected infallibilism, al-Āmidī, for example, nevertheless endorsed takhyīr, albeit on the grounds of consensus rather than rational ones.

---

27 For a summary of these problems, see Zysow, supra n. 1 at 479–483.
28 See, e.g., al-Shāṭibī, supra n. 24 at 135–136 (discussing the deleterious impact of takhyīr upon the integrity of the legal system).
30 Zysow, supra n. 1 at 464.
31 Al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 352 (endorsing infallibilism) and at 374 (rejecting the doctrine of takhyīr).
32 Al-Āmidī, supra n. 11 at 247 (rejecting infallibilism) and at 318 (endorsing takhyīr); Weiss, Search, supra n. 17 at 728.
33 Id. at 318 (stating that but for the consensus of the companions on this point, the position rejecting takhyīr would be the better argument). The Mālikī jurist al-Bājī shared al-Āmidī’s views, endorsing takhyīr on historical grounds even as he rejected infallibilism. Al-Bājī, supra n. 23 at 623 (rejecting infallibilism) and at 644–645 (endorsing takhyīr).
Despite the association of infallibilism with subjectivism, and fallibilism with objectivism, jurists such as al-Ghazālī and al-Shāṭibī, despite their differences on fallibilism, each endorsed an obligation of tarjīḥ for muqallids in controversial matters rather than takhyīr because of what was, essentially, a subjectivist view of moral obligation. The advocates of takhyīr, for example al-Qarāfī and al-ʿIzz b. ʿAbdassalām, by contrast, took an ethical position that was indifferent to the subjective views of the muqallid; accordingly, they judged the conduct of that person solely from the objective perspective of whether it conformed to a valid opinion of any mujtahid. For al-Ghazālī and al-Shāṭibī, takhyīr was immoral precisely because it was indifferent to the subjective motivation of the individual muqallid. This indifference subverted what to them was one of the highest purposes of revelation: to subject human beings to law. Takhyīr was inconsistent with this goal because it functioned as a de facto means of broadening the category of the permissible to all things that were in dispute among the jurists. Al-Shāṭibī, for example, complained that jurists of his time had gone so far as to take the existence of a controversy among jurists as evidence that the conduct at issue was morally indifferent (ibāḥah).

In making his case, al-Shāṭibī argued that there was a categorical difference, on the one hand, between the right of a muqallid to follow the view of one among the many mujtahids he happened upon without ascertaining which was the most qualified, and on the other hand, arbitrarily following one among the many opinions expressed by various mujtahids after the muqallid became aware of their disagreement. The failure to distinguish these two scenarios led many to make the erroneous analogy between the practice of the early Muslim community—which allowed muqallids to ask the opinion of any of the companions who were mujtahids without requiring them to identify which of them was the most reliable in his reasoning—and the practice of takhyīr which gives the muqallid the right to choose arbitrarily among the various mujtahids’ opinions.

---

34 See Zysow, supra n. 1 at 466–467 (“Fallibilism in its various versions holds that the result of ijtihād can be tested against an objective measure.”) and at 469 (“Essentially, infallibilism is a doctrine of solipsism.”).
35 Al-Shāṭibī, supra n. 24 at 118–131.
36 Al-Qarāfī, supra n. 1 at 4134 (quoting with approval Ibn ʿAbdassalām’s position that it was permissible to follow any opinion so long as it was a valid rule, meaning, were a judge to rule on the basis of that rule, his ruling would not be overturned).
37 Al-Shāṭibī, supra n. 24 at 141.
38 Id. at 132–133.
The reason these two scenarios is different is that in the first case—where the muqallid is ignorant of the controversy—he is giving effect to the reasoning of the mujtahid, and by hypothesis, the mujtahid has engaged in a good faith effort to understand what God wants in this particular situation. Accordingly, the muqallid is acting in concert with some good faith understanding of God’s will. In the second case—where the muqallid is given the freedom to choose which opinion he will follow—the muqallid is not giving effect to the relevant revelatory text which the mujtahid had relied upon, but is rather giving effect simply to his own ends. As a consequence, he is acting out of desire (hawâ) rather than in compliance with the teachings of revelation. Takhyīr in al-Shāṭibī’s view severs the nexus between subjective apprehension of probability born out of good faith interpretation of revelation and moral obligation, and therefore subverts one of the primary goals of revelation: to replace desire as the motive for human behavior with obedience to God.39

While al-Ghazâlî suggests a weak epistemological argument in favor of tarjih (that there is a chance that a mujtahid made an error by failing to identify an express text that applies to the case), his primary objection to takhyīr is ethical, not epistemological. Like al-Shāṭibī, he complained that takhyīr has the effect of relieving muqallids of the burdens of moral obligation. Indeed, he identified the asymmetry between the ethical obligations of the mujtahid—who is subject to a categorical obligation to exercise his judgment in matters for which there is no express revelatory text and to follow his probable judgment that results from the exercise of that duty in virtually all cases—and the obligations of the muqallid under a rule of takhyīr—in which the requirement of having a probable judgment is abandoned—as being fatal to takhyīr. The principle of takhyīr, moreover, contains within it the threat that it would subvert the need for ījthād: in all cases where there is no explicit revelatory text, a mujtahid could conclude that he can do whatever he wants because whatever he chooses will conform with the view of one mujtahid, and therefore will be permissible. In short, takhyīr not only freed the vast majority of Muslims from firm ethical obligations, it also had the potential to subvert the incentives of mujtahids and thereby threaten the continuing viability of the activity of ījthād itself.40

39 Id. at 132–135.
40 Al-Ghazâlî, supra n. 1 at 373–374.
That the advocates of tarjīḥ were more concerned with the moral integrity of the individual Muslim, whether a mujtahid or a muqallid, than the objective coherence of the ethical system, is evidenced by their discussion of what happens when it is impossible for a muqallid to determine which of the competing mujtahids’ views is weightier. In theory, the muqallid was to treat the different opinions of the mujtahids in the same manner a mujtahid would treat conflicting texts of revelation. While a mujtahid would apply substantive criteria to determine which text ought to be given greater weight in such a circumstance, the task of the muqallid was limited to determine which mujtahid was more virtuous, virtue being measured along an index of two variables: piety and learning. Accordingly, the muqallid should adopt the opinion of that mujtahid whom he believes to be the most learned and most pious. The numerous possible combinations of piety and learning, and whether piety is weightier than learning, are not important in this context except to the extent that they reveal the difficulty of discharging such a task. Nevertheless, the point for those uṣūlis who demanded tarjīḥ was that the muqallid make this attempt, and if he reaches a conclusion, then he is bound to accept the opinions of that mujtahid without engaging in “fatwa-shopping.” If, however, after having engaged in this process, he is unable to reach a probable judgment regarding which mujtahid is more virtuous, he is relieved of moral obligation with respect to that particular issue, at least with respect to God, in toto.\(^{41}\)

Al-Qarāfī, and his teacher al-ʿIzz b. ʿAbdassalām, by contrast, are indifferent to the nexus between the conduct of the actor and the actor’s subjective understanding of his action in light of revelation. Because of al-Qarāfī’s commitment to the notion that legal obligation is tied to some benefit to the actor (maṣlaḥah), he rejected the argument that imposition of taklīf—simply for the sake of imposing obligation—was a goal of revelation. Indeed, he dismissed this argument on the grounds that it imposed hardship (mashaqqah) upon individuals simply for the purpose of hardship.

\(^{41}\) Al-Shāṭībī, supra n. 24 at 291 (stating that where a muqallid is unable to know what his obligation is, the muqallid is in a position akin to that which exists prior to the advent of revelation and were the muqallid to be subject to some obligation in such circumstances, it would be impossible for him to discharge it); Abū al-Maʿālī ʿAbdalmalik b. ‘Abdallāh al-Juwaynī, 2 al-Burhān fi Uṣūl al-Fiqh 884 (stating that when a muqallid cannot determine which mujtahid is more virtuous, he is like someone on a deserted island who only knows the foundations of Islam, and accordingly, has no obligations toward God with respect to that issue). Al-Ghazālī, however, in this circumstance permitted takhyīr. Al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 16.
rather than furthering their own good, a principle that he believed the Sharī'ā denied. Accordingly, al-Qarāfī understood ethical controversy as creating a kind of “freedom for the actor (tawṣiʿah ‘alā al-mukallaf”).” Al-Qarāfī limited this qualified ethical freedom in two respects: first, the muqallid must not choose among the various mujtahids’ positions in such a manner as would produce a violation of consensus; and second, he must not follow an opinion which, if it were the basis of a judicial ruling, could be overturned by a subsequent judge (a “pseudo-rule”). Both of these limitations, moreover, are objective, meaning they do not depend upon the muqallid’s subjective appreciation that he violated consensus or acted on the basis of a pseudo-rule.

Al-Qarāfī gave the following example (apparently from his own experience) of how the first limitation could become relevant. A follower of al-Shāfīʿī asked him whether it would be permissible for him to follow Mālik’s view regarding the purity of clothes stitched with pig hair. Al-Qarāfī replied in the affirmative, but cautioned that if the questioner intended to follow Mālik’s view on the purity of his garment as opposed to the rule of al-Shāfīʿī, then he had to take care to follow Mālik’s views on the requirements of valid ablutions, paying particular attention to those rules in which Mālik differed from al-Shāfīʿī. Accordingly, if the Shāfīʿī followed Mālik regarding the purity of his garment, but followed al-Shāfīʿī with respect to the permissibility of rubbing only a portion of the head during ablutions, both Imām Mālik and Imām al-Shāfīʿī would declare that man’s prayer to be invalid. Thus, takhyīr poses a risk to the muqallid that following the doctrine of one school does not: inadvertently nullifying the validity of one’s acts of devotion, and for that reason, al-Qarāfī suggested to his Shāfīʿī questioner that he might be better off sticking to the teachings of his own school.

As for the second limitation on takhyīr, a pseudo-rule is one that is contrary to consensus (ijmāʿ), a legal principle (al-qawāʿid), an explicit text (al-naṣṣ alladhī lā yahṭmil al-tawwīl) or an a fortiori analogy (al-qiyās al-jalī). An example of such a pseudo-rule is the Ḥanafī rule giving neighbors a right of first refusal (shufʿat al-jīwār) in connection with the sale of adjoining real property. Because a judge who ruled in accordance with that rule would have his ruling overturned (at least according to the Mālikīs), a fortiori it is impermissible for a muqallid to act upon that rule.

42 Al-Qarāfī, supra n. 18 at 4148.
43 Id. at 4149.
in his private life. Other than these two objective limitations, however, al-Qarāfī is unconcerned about the consequences of takhyīr on the moral life of muqallids. In fact, he denied that it is impermissible for muqallids to seek out, consciously, the dispensations (rukḥaṣ) of the various mujtahids, on the condition that in so doing the muqallid takes care not to violate consensus or follow a pseudo-rule. Unlike al-Ghazālī and al-Shāṭibi, who viewed imposing moral obligation on human beings as one of the most important functions of revelation, al-Qarāfī denied that revelation came simply to impose obligations on people willy-nilly; rather, he understood the purpose of revelation as being to assist individuals achieve various beneficial ends. Unlike al-Ghazālī and al-Shāṭibi, then, al-Qarāfī’s strand of soft infallibilism, combined with takhyīr, operated to produce an objective method by which a muqallid, presumably in consultation with a scholar, could know whether his conduct was consistent with the demands of Islamic normativity. This objective account of the muqallid’s ethical obligations, however, resulted in a fundamentally different standard of behavior for a muqallid relative to a mujtahid: while the latter was obligated to conduct his life in accordance with his understanding of revelatory evidence (al-adillah al-sharʿiyah), the muqallid was free to pursue the ends of his life without considering the implications of revelatory evidence, directly or indirectly, except insofar as they produced incontrovertible rules.

III. Trust and Autonomy

The mujtahid, at least with respect to those areas of life which are unregulated by an express revelatory norm, appears to be a law unto himself: answerable only to God, his ethical life is governed only by universal norms that are either true in themselves, i.e. such rules that constitute the maʿlūm min al-dīn bi-l-ḍarūrah, or particular rules that he has formulated for himself based on his considered opinion using the interpretive techniques of uṣūl al-fiqh. The muqallid’s ethical life, as we saw from the previous section, is more (e.g. under al-Ghazālī’s or al-Shāṭibi’s reasoning) or less (e.g. under al-Qarāfī’s or Ibn ‘Abdassalām’s reasoning) derivative of

---

44 Id. at 4148.
45 Id. at 4149.
the mujtahid’s ethical reasoning. The muqallid does not, as discussed previously, defer to the mujtahid because he lacks the capacity for independent moral reasoning. Presumably, he chooses to be a muqallid because, given the various options available to him in his life, he would rather spend his time doing something, e.g. farming or trading, other than becoming a theological/ethical/legal specialist, a task that could very well be quite burdensome.47

To choose the option of taqlīd, however, a muqallid must have some basis on which he can distinguish a genuine mujtahid from a mere pretender. In other words, a muqallid must have a basis to trust the judgment of the would-be mujtahid. In this context the term trust is probably a more accurate translation of the term zann than probable belief, despite the fact that the uṣūlis claim that the muqallid is responsible to confirm that he has a reasonable belief that the person whom he is asking for a fatwa is in fact a qualified mujtahid. Zann, of course, is literally different from trust insofar as it denotes a particular subjective state of mind that entails the belief that A, for example, is more likely to be true than B.

Trust, as some contemporary moral philosophers have argued, cannot be reduced simply to a determination that some particular fact has a more likely existence than not. It involves a relationship between one party, A, and another party, B, in which A reaches some subjective assessment as to the likelihood that B will act in a certain way, but in circumstances where A cannot directly observe B’s conduct. In addition, in a relationship of trust the manner by which B conducts himself will have an important effect on A.48 There is also an important asymmetry in trust: “it cannot be given except by those who have only limited knowledge, and usually even less control, over those to whom it is given,”49 and while there may be an accounting of sorts, the accounting is usually deferred sometime into the future.50 Trust also connotes something different than merely obeying commands; instead, it is “to take instruction or counsel, to take advice, to be patient and defer satisfying one’s reasonable desire to understand what is going on, to learn some valuable discipline, or to conform to authoritative laws which others have made.”51 As a consequence, a trust relation-

47 For a discussion of the topics someone must master in order to qualify as a mujtahid, see, e.g., al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 242–244 (noting in particular the difficulties of mastering knowledge of the sunnah).
49 Id. at 139.
50 Id. at 140.
51 Id. at 144.
ship can be viewed as an investment by A whose returns, if successful, will increase with time, thus benefitting A, but if B turns out to be untrustworthy, the relationship will prove detrimental to A. Trust accordingly always involves risk to A that B will abuse the relationship to A’s loss.52

In my view, the relationship of the muqallid to the mujtahid is better understood as a relationship of trust rather than one of epistemological dependence. Weiss has suggested that the enterprise of ijtihād is, in an important sense, a cooperative relationship, at least in the sense that the mujtahid depends upon a steady stream of questions from muqallids to provide him with the opportunity to develop legal rules.53 I would suggest, however, that the cooperative nature of the enterprise of ijtihād, and hence the development of Islamic ethics and law through the interpretation of revelation, requires a much thicker notion of cooperation and trust than that which would be required if the only function of the muqallid were to provide the questions necessary for the development of the mujtahid’s thought. Indeed, such a conception of the role of the muqallid reduces him to a mere instrument of the mujtahid: the muqallid would be at once the occasion for the development of the law and its object, but would have no role whatsoever in its development.

If the muqallid-mujtahid relationship were understood to be a relationship of trust, on the other hand, it may be the case that the muqallid necessarily would play a more active role in the development of Islamic law than that accorded to them by uṣūlīs. This is especially so for uṣūlīs such as al-Ghazālī, al-Shāṭibī and al-Juwaynī who reject takhyūr in favor of tarjīh. Tarjīh is only possible on the assumption that muqallids are responsible to choose their moral advisors carefully, by monitoring their objective characteristics—such as learning and (outward) piety—to confirm that they are persons of moral integrity. Indeed, even for those uṣūlīs who accept takhyūr—whether with diffidence in the example of al-Āmidī, or embrace it in the example of al-Qarāfī—the concept of the moral integrity (ʿadālah) of the mujtahid is central to the functioning of the system.\textsuperscript{54}

The judgment that a particular person possesses moral integrity, of course, is an ongoing one: unlike a judicial determination ruling that the property in dispute belongs to A and not B, a judgment of moral integrity is always provisional and thus is always subject to revision based on future experience. The responsibility to monitor prospective mujtahids’ moral integrity is a burden that falls on everyone, not simply mujtahids. Tellingly, virtually all of the uṣūlīs surveyed for this essay agree that a muqallid can rely on the collective judgment of his contemporaries regarding the moral credibility of a prospective mujtahid as evidenced by the fact that this person is in fact engaged in public fatwa-giving without censure. While these authors did not explain why this is sufficient evidence, one could justify this assumption if one believes that individual members of society have had sufficiently lengthy and ethically significant interactions with that figure to have allowed them to conclude, independently of one another, that he is a person of moral integrity. Here, the logic of tawātur seems to be implicit in the justification of this kind of evidence for moral integrity. In the absence of an assumption of active independent monitoring by large numbers of persons of those who publicly give fatwas, the right to rely on such a fact could not justify a muqallid placing his trust in that person.

Indeed, the one dissenter on this point—al-Juwaynī—confirms the argument developed here that the mujtahid-muqallid relationship is one of trust rather than knowledge. For al-Juwaynī, collective judgments regarding the qualifications of a person who engages in public fatwa-giving cannot justify a muqallid’s conclusion that such a person is in fact a mujtahid. Al-Juwaynī denied the probative force of this collective report on the grounds that the determination of whether a person is, or is not, a mujtahid—and hence qualified to give fatwas—cannot be resolved by reputation evidence, no matter the number of witnesses.

But, al-Juwaynī’s solution to this problem is even more radical in exposing the trust that is at the core of this relationship: he proposed that the only way for a muqallid to reach a probative judgment as to whether someone is a mujtahid is simply to ask the would-be mujtahid.

\textsuperscript{54} Moral integrity, while not strictly speaking a condition of ijtihād, is a condition for the validity of a fatwa. See, e.g., al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 342.
Al-Juwaynī’s argument cuts to the heart of the matter: we have no way of knowing that a person is in fact a mujtahid because the most critical element of the vocation—moral integrity—is not amenable to outside verification, but is only something that can be discovered over time. At the beginning of the relationship, all a muqallid can do is ask, and hope that the person answering is trustworthy. At its beginning, however, the muqallid would lack any basis upon which he could objectively justify his relationship with the mujtahid at issue. It is only over time, as a result of repeated interactions between him and the mujtahid (and perhaps other encounters between other muqallids known to him and that mujtahid as well) that the muqallid can determine whether the trust he had reposed in the mujtahid was justifiable. Given this, asking seems like an obvious way to begin.

But, does the uṣūlī discourse on the muqallid justify the belief that a muqallid is in a position to engage in the monitoring activity that is arguably necessary in order to generate the trust required for the relationship between mujtahids and muqallids to succeed? Indeed, one of the principal objections to the tarjīḥ position was that muqallids are incapable of determining which mujtahid is “the more learned and the more pious” with any competence. Indeed, one could take as further evidence of muqallids’ incompetence the fact that advocates of tarjīḥ refused to permit muqallids to engage in tarjīḥ based on the substance of the different opinions. Al-Ghazālī and al-Rāzī, for example, dismiss the possibility that muqallids could engage in substantive tarjīḥ on the grounds that it would constitute moral negligence: just as a parent would be held negligent and liable if he medicated his sick child using his own judgment, even after consulting with doctors, so too a muqallid would be negligent and morally culpable if he took it upon himself to judge which of the two contradictory positions is substantively stronger.55 In both cases, he simply lacks the competency to engage in the judgment. Al-Juwaynī was even more blunt in rejecting this possibility, which he described as “giving reign to intuition and idiocy (ittibāʿ al-hawājis wa al-ḥamāqāt).”56

Al-Shāṭibī, unlike al-Juwaynī, al-Ghazālī and al-Rāzī, did not even raise the possibility of the muqallid engaging in his own substantive tarjīḥ. While he accepted the notion of tarjīḥ based on piety and learning—which al-Shāṭibī called referred to as “general weighing (tarjīḥ ʿāmm)” —he 55 Al-Ghazālī, supra n. 1 at 374; al-Rāzī, supra n. 14 at 534.

56 Al-Juwaynī, supra n. 41 at 883.
introduced another technique for giving precedence to one mujtahid over another which he called “particular weighing (tarjīḥ khāṣṣ).” This method of selection explicitly incorporates the notion of the mujtahid as a moral exemplar, someone whose life—and not just his learning or outward piety—represents an outstanding model of moral excellence (qudwa). The most important feature of such a mujtahid is his moral integrity as evidenced by the consistency between his private actions and his public pronouncements.57

That muqallids are incompetent to judge the substantive reasoning of a mujtahid is somewhat of a puzzle, however, at least to the extent that muqallids are endowed with the attributes given to them in uṣūl al-fiqh. After all, the uṣūlis’ conception of taqlīd assumes that the muqallid has full rational capacity, something that allows him to recognize the theological and ethical truths of Islam. One might have expected that, given this reservoir of true theological and moral knowledge, muqallids might have a legitimate basis upon which they could evaluate the substance of different fatwas. Indeed, one of the hadiths included in al-Nawawi’s popular 40 Hadiths suggests that even the most ordinary individuals carry within them the capacity for moral discrimination between virtue and vice. According to that hadith, Wābiṣah, a companion of the Prophet Muḥammad asked him about righteousness (al-birr), to which the Prophet was said to have replied, saying: “Ask the opinion of your soul! Ask the opinion of your heart,” repeating that three times. Then, the Prophet continued, saying: “Righteousness is that in which the soul and heart find tranquility and sin is that which pricks the soul and bounces back and forth in the breast, even though the people may you give opinions [to the contrary].”58

For al-Shāṭibī, and perhaps al-Ghazālī, the implicit answer seems to be that even if the muqallid has substantial theological and moral knowledge, when it comes to matters of moral controversy, he is too self-interested to behave morally: he will consistently choose that which pleases him and serves his interest (hawā) rather than engaging in an objective moral analysis of what God requires of him. It could therefore be argued that it is precisely because a muqallid has theological and ethical knowledge that he comes to be conscious of how his ethical decision making can be tainted by his self-interest, and therefore that he ought to defer to the views of a trustworthy third-party, the mujtahid, who can judge the ethical consequences of the situation objectively. Accordingly, the fact that the moral knowledge of a muqallid is inoperative when it comes to his own conduct does not negate the fact that he is in fact a bearer of moral knowledge; it could be that it is the problematic element of self-interest that precludes him from relying on that self-knowledge in morally controversial matters. Conversely, he would be capable of serving as a monitor of mujtahids because in that case there would not be a conflict between judgment and desire. It is the muqallid’s capacity for disinterested moral judgment that allows for the relationship of trust that is at the heart of the mujtahid-muqallid relationship to form and be sustained over time.

57 Al-Shāṭibī, supra n. 24 at 270–271.

IV. Conclusion

The relationship of epistemology to obligation in Islamic theology and ethics ultimately led to the recognition of a limited kind of moral pluralism. This fact in turn generated political as well as ethical problems. With respect to the problem of how to maintain a sense of ethical obligation in morally controversial areas of life, Sunnī Muslim theologians split into two camps, those advocating takhyīr and those advocating tarjīḥ. While both sides of this debate understood that muqallids’ moral obligations in controversial areas were derived from mujtahids’ reasoning, each camp had a fundamentally different view of what moral obligation entailed in the case of a muqallid. For at least some of those who advocated takhyīr like al-Qarāfī and his teacher al-ʿIzz b. Abdassalām, moral obligation was objective: as long as a mukallaf did not violate the objective boundaries of Islamic ethical norms, his conduct was both legal and moral. For at least some of those who advocated tarjīḥ, moral obligation was much thicker: it required the muqallid to justify his conduct by reference to some revelatory source (dalīl). It was the role of the mujtahid to provide the nexus between a mukallaf’s conduct and revelation. For them, it ultimately did not matter what the conduct was, so much that it was grounded in a good faith interpretation of revelation. For either system to work, however, muqallids need to have sufficient moral judgment to identify trustworthy authorities. The theological tradition of uṣūl al-fiqh surveyed in this article, however, under-theorizes this problem by failing to explain how a muqallid may be able to identify trustworthy authorities. I suggest that the answer (if there is one) must lie in the notion that muqallids do in fact possess a robust—even if incomplete—set of moral data provided by the moral truths of Islam which is sufficient to permit them to distinguish between genuine mujtahids and mere pretenders. A fully determined theory of taqlīd would require an explanation of how the moral truths in the possession of the muqallīd enable him to process, critically, the performance of would-be mujtahids as a condition for the trust implicit in the relationship to arise. Such a theory, however, at least as far as I know, has yet to be developed.

Bibliography

